Emperor penguins spend most of the time in the open ocean but in April or May they settle on the ice between the sea and the land. Couples pair off and the female lays her egg. She shoves it across the ice towards the male and goes out to sea to hunt food.

The male balances the egg on top of his feet and keeps it warm with his belly fat; he stands this way for 64 days. He waits for his mate to return and constantly loses weight.

Finally she returns and searches out the half-starved father. He is shrunken now by a third to a half in body weight. She feeds her crop of chewed fish to the newly hatched chick.

Then she takes over the baby-sitting for a few weeks and the father goes off to the ocean to eat. The parents switch back and forth this way until four months after the birth, then the ice breaks away from the land and starts floating out to sea. It takes the penguin with it.
