A job interview is uncomfortable enough for someone in search of him employment without the interviewers trying to give them a hard time. On my last his two interviews, it seemed as if everybody in the office did their best to put me on edge. For example, at the company that was looking for a receptionist, the office manager asked if I knew how to use desktop publishing software. Some of my they don't friends work as receptionists, and she doesn't even do any writing, let alone his desktop publishing. I later learned that many of the managers at the company they are ask questions like that merely to test the poise of the people he is interviewing.

At the other office, somebody in a suit and tie asked me whether I would mind his serving their coffee. I refused to answer. I wish that someone who works at a his decent office would just offer me a job in their firm so that I don't have to do any more interviewing.
